

Where the Land Forgets Itself

"This poem reflects a moment of emotional distance between two people—where unspoken feelings, hesitation, and missed signals create a quiet standoff. The sea becomes a metaphor for that fragile space: waves that reach but hold back, like words never said, and a tide that slowly returns, like courage finding its way back. What unfolds on the shore is not just nature, but the quiet resolution of something that almost slipped away."

He sat where the land forgets itself, toes buried in cool, obedient sand.
The moon laid a silver road on the water,
guiding nothing and everything at once.
The world had gone quiet—lights asleep, voices forgiven,
and stars, finally unafraid, watched him from afar.

The waves spoke in uneven sentences—
some bold, some breaking midway, some reaching close
only to hesitate and fall back.
They stopped at a certain line,
as if distance had become a habit,
learned from being misunderstood.
He saw himself in that pause—wanting, yet holding back.

Time shifted without asking.
The tide changed its mind.
Slowly, almost shyly,
the sea leaned closer—
not in a rush, not in force,
but in quiet courage.
Cool water touched his feet,
lingered there,
as if whispering, I am still here.

So he asked the darkness for a sign—
not loudly, not bravely,
just once.
If this pull is real, he said,
let the sea come for me.
And the sea answered—
rising in a single, luminous wave, running toward him without doubt,
until it broke around him
like certainty finally finding its voice.